READING THE TRANSCRIPTIONS

The Bass Clef is written with standard notation, note values have been written as accurately as possible.

The Tab Notation (bottom staff) corresponds to the fret (the number) and the string (the line) which the fret position correlates to.

The four lines are:- Bottom line, the E string, the second bottom line is the A string, the third line, the D string and the top line the G string .

So e.g.1  means fret 0 on the A string = A

So e.g.2  means fret 3 on the A string = C

Preface

Paul McCartney's contribution to popular music since the early Sixties has been enormous. His songwriting talents and career have been well documented in the past, but relatively little has been said about his skill as a bass guitarist.

His style was born of an era when basic root-fifth vamps were about all a bass player had to contend with. Paul expanded on these, incorporating more 8th note (quaver) feels on tunes like 'Please Please Me', and walking quarter notes (crotchets) on 'All My Loving'. The quaver fills were influenced by many of the rock and roll tunes of the period. His attention to detail, particularly with regard to note lengths is a good example of his grasp of the concept of feel. No doubt this stems from his gift for composition, and his wider view of the song as a whole; he is clearly not just concerned with the bass part, and as a consequence the strength of his lines is that they are integral parts of the composition.

Paul McCartney set new standards in providing supportive bass lines with economy. His Lo-mid tone from the Hofner 'Beatle Bass' cut through on medium wave radio sets and Dansette record players to make lines such as those on 'Day Tripper' and 'I Want To Hold Your Hand' irresistible. They still sound great today; there is a breadth of style, from the highly improvisatory 'Get Back', to the regular riffs of 'Taxman' and 'The Ballad Of John And Yoko'.

More than a quarter of a century later these lines are still great examples to any bass player. In making these transcriptions I have tried to be as accurate as possible; you will find that the effort you put into learning them will reward you with a much better understanding of just what makes a great bass line.

Equipment

Throughout most of his time with The Beatles, McCartney used two Hofner 500/1 'Violin' basses. One dates from about 1960 (this one had the logo 'Hofner' running down the head-stock, two pickups close to the neck joint and a scratch plate across the bottom half of the body). The second one was given to Paul at the Royal Variety Show in November 1963.

Later he started to use a Rickenbacker 4001 bass. This can be heard on some of the later material, most notably 'Lucy In The Sky With Diamonds' and 'With A Little Help From My Friends', on 'Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band', which featured the bass with the rubber string mutes hard up against the strings for the characteristically heavily damped sound.

For amplification in the early period he used a home made system comprising of an open chassis valve amp with a huge cabinet, which hummed badly. An improvised setup of studio equipment was used on recordings.

Then came a variety of Vox equipment. The T60 transistor amp and matching cabinet feature a 15" and a 12" speaker (the 12" speaker had a low bass filter). This particular setup was called the 'piggy back'. On heavy gigs the T60 was prone to overheating, so on the major tours after 1964 an AC50 valve amp was used with the T60 cabinet.

By 1965 at Shea Stadium an AC100 was used (this was basically a hot-rodded AC50) with two T60 cabs. Paul used a Vox 4120 after touring stopped in August 1966. This featured a hybrid transistor pre-amp, a valve power amp with a 2 x 15" cab.

When Brian Epstein died in 1967 the band were freed from his promise to Vox that they would use that company's amplification exclusively. Paul was subsequently seen using a Fender Bassman setup during recordings in 1969.

A 'walking' four in a bar pattern, not the more typical two feel of the early Beatles. Note how the quick decay of the sound makes the the notes well separated, and how the guitars, playing 12 quaver triplets to the bar, really drive the tune along. The first bar sets up the second in a smooth, scale-based fashion. Bar 5 (A) prepares nicely for the A major triad in bar 6 (A, C#, E). This is a very well constructed line.

This song features a bouncy, four in a bar bass line with an underlying triplet pulse. The notes at bar 1 of (A) are not quite full value, but not staccato either (short, sharp, detached). Watch for the quaver triplet fill in the sixth bar of each verse.

A root - major 3rd - 5th pattern based line. Make sure you leave a 'breath' space between the first crotchet of each bar and the quaver on the point of the second beat; this gives the line a bounce. Then try playing the first crotchet long - it doesn't swing! This line is in fact one of Paul's most consistent lines. Make sure there is a constant feel throughout. The pattern only changes on bars 6-9 of the Coda where the dotted crotchet (beat 1) is long and the second beat is shorter.

A consistent quaver pulse gives this tune a driving rhythm. Paul alternates between the open A string and the 7th fret of the D string for the A an octave higher in this tune. Using a pick he hammers on some tasty fills, for example in bars 4 and 7 of (E). Although the feel is consistent the pattern is very improvised between the A's in octaves.

Paul plays a solid four in a bar feel for this rock ballad, alternating with more urgent eights for bars 4/5 and 9/10 of (C). The third verse (D) sees him improvising on a root-fifth theme for two bars, setting up the fourth bar of the verse with a C major scale to the F. He does the same at the bar before (E), going from F7 to B $\flat$. Notice how, two bars before (G), Paul introduces quaver movement to complement the vocal line. This builds nicely into the round-and-round at the end of the song.

I Want To Hold Your Hand

An early example (late 1963) of Paul playing a typical dotted crotchet, quaver, crotchet feel for much of the song. Watch your articulation as the last note of every bar should not go up to the barline. This helps the swing of the track. Also check the consistency of the feel and tempo throughout this track. The Beatles set new standards in time keeping, always sounding relaxed and together, and this is in no small measure due to Paul's excellent grasp of tempo and feel.

An on-beat four feel for this track. Take care again over the articulation of the feel, making sure the notes are not quite full value. The bridges however, are more legato, so play the notes to their full value.

There is a driving 8's feel for this intro, going into broken 8's phrasing with the drums to deliver a consistent groove. Paul reverts to the driving 8's for the band section and then changes back to the broken feel for the chorus. He seamlessly alternates between backing the brass and vocal patterns.

Paul used a heavily damped sound for this number, achieved by utilising the string mutes built into the bridge on the Rickenbacker 4001. He plays some lovely descending fills using 9ths and 6ths in addition to the chord tones, to give the line a sense of movement and melody. To emulate this feel either put a duster under the strings or use your palm to mute the strings by the bridge.

This is a classic pattern-based McCartney line. The first crotchet (quarter note) of each bar should be played short to give the riff a bounce. Bars 3 and 7 of each verse should have long notes on the first two crotchets which phrase with the rest of the band. At letter (E) he doubles the feel of the pattern to give the middle section more urgency.
